This pdf is wonderful. We have gone through it and so I am certain that I am going to go back to study it again once more in the future. It has been developed in an exceedingly straightforward way which is merely after I finished reading through this pdf where it really transformed me, modified the way I think.

Condition: New. Publisher/Verlag: LAP Lambert Academic Publishing | Evaluation of PCR method to detect fungal pathogen in microbial keratitis | Microbial keratitis is a serious ocular infection. It is often difficult to establish a microbial keratitis that is due to fungal infection. Inadequate therapy and delayed diagnosis of fungal keratitis leads to generally poor visual outcomes. The objective of this study is to determine the sensitivity and specificity of PCR to detect fungal pathogen in microbial keratitis. In this study, a PCR method was compared to the conventional method to detect fungal pathogen in microbial keratitis. The PCR was performed with primers pair F1,R2 and F3,R4 from two consecutive regions in the 18S rRNA gene. Positive result for PCR was considered when there was presence of this amplified target sequence in both primer pairs F1,R2 and F3,R4. A statistical diagnostic test revealed that the PCR has a sensitivity of 90.9% and a specificity of 94.7% to detect fungal pathogen in microbial keratitis. PCR is a rapid, sensitive and a useful method to detect fungal pathogen in microbial keratitis. | Format: Paperback | Language/Sprache: english | 88 pp.
