There are more than miles of rivers navigable by steamer west of Lake Superior. It is possible to go by water from the mouth of the St. Lawrence through the great lakes, and down the Mackenzie to the Arctic Ocean, a trip of more than miles, in which less than 150 miles will necessarily be on land. Great Bear Lake is 150 miles long, Athabasca Lake 230 miles long, and Great Slave Lake is 300 miles long, with an average width of 50 miles. The Mackenzie River is in some places seven miles wide, with an average width of four miles, and is described by Archbishop Clut, as a deeper, wider, and grander river than the St. Lawrence, and it furnishes with its tributaries miles of navigable rivers.
