Excerpt from Art in the House: Historical, Critical, and Aesthetic Studies on the Decoration and Furnishing of the Dwelling Dr. Falkes book opens with an account of the Greco-Roman house as the most perfect type of the antique dwelling in plan, construction, and decoration. We are quite sure that while on all these points he rightly considers it to be more richly suggestive than any older house forms, such as those of Egypt and Assyria, he did not mean his readers to infer that he thought them unworthy of consideration, for they are confessedly marked by a simplicity, dignity, and solidity of construction, and a correct use of decoration, which give them a high place in the building systems of the world. In order, therefore, to make Dr. Falkes excellent work more historically complete, we have ventured to preface it with a brief description of the Egyptian and Assyrian house, from which some of the most marked features of the Greco-Roman were derived. We find, in all countries, that building forms are dictated by and adapted to the exigencies of climate. That of the valley of the Nile was so peculiarly delightful, the sky so serene, the air so tempered, that its inhabitants might well have regarded artificial habitations as a superfluous luxury; but the constructive instinct is strong in man, and nowhere did it express itself in simpler, more enduring, and more majestic forms than in Egypt.
