Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from Modeling the Effectiveness of a Strategic Planning System The objectives dimension is conceptualized with reference to operative goals pursued by organizations (steers, The literature has emphasized the following major objectives of planning: financial benefits such as improvement in short-term and long-term economic performance (king Cleland, 1978; Lorange Vancil, 1977; Steiner, predicting future trends (amara, 1981; Ansoff, 1975; King Cleland, 1978; Paul Donovan Taylor, evaluation of alternatives (camillus, 1975; Lorange, avoiding problem areas (lorange Vancil, and enhancing management development (hex Majluf, 1984; King Cleland, The system-capab dimension is non-obvious and requires some elaboration. The underlying logic for treating this as an effectiveness dimension stems from Lorange s (1979) arguments that a system s capabilities should be treated as a measure of planning success. To quote Lorange: many of the measures [of effectiveness] were based on some general surrogate variable, when it probably would have been more relevant to measure effectiveness as a function of how well the formal planning system s capabilities were able to meet the specific planning needs (1979; p. 230; emphasis added). This suggests a cascading relationship. At one level, improving the system s capabilities is effectiveness. At deeper level, ultimate outcome effectiveness arises from improved system capability. Accordingly, we treat this dimension as an intermediate level in the modeling of strategic planning effectiveness.
