Diploma Thesis from the year 2005 in the subject Economics - Case Scenarios, grade: 1, 3, University of Hannover (Institut für Entwicklungs- und Agrarökonomik), 68 entries in the bibliography, language: English, comment: Ausgezeichnet mit dem Förderpreis der Victor Rizkallah Stiftung 2006, in Anerkennung hervorragender wissenschaftlicher Leistungen an der Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz Universität Hannover, abstract: Using participatory training approaches such as farmer field schools (FFS) is perceived to be an appropriate technique to improve farmers knowledge of complex agro-ecological systems and Integrated Production and Pest Management (IPPM) technologies. However, the FFS approach appears to be more costly than alternative less intensive approaches of knowledge transfer. High per capita expenditures are more justified, if knowledge can be disseminated through informal farmer-to-farmer interactions. Participatory extension approaches therefore rely on interpersonal channels and group mechanisms for diffusing greater awareness and facilitating learning among the group of untrained farmers. Although diffusion is not an explicit goal of the FFS approach, it is nevertheless a desired side-effect, which could invalidate the reproach of fiscal unsustainability. Several empirical studies found that knowledge generated by participatory extension training does not always sufficiently diffuse to non-participating farmers, because of the complexity of knowledge imparted in the course of a FFS. Farmers nevertheless exchange their experiences with each other, and thus, information about IPPM is being disseminated in the villages. This diffusion of information can have a significant impact on adoption behavior and be an important factor for a successful introduction and establishment of an innovation like IPPM. This case study, conducted in the Region de Niayes in Senegal in 2004, investigates the effects of training intensity on the diffusion of information. The objective This item ships from multiple locations. Your book may arrive from Roseburg, OR, La...
