Excerpt from Causes of Damage to Fruits and Vegetables During Shipment Altho some carloads of perishables were designated as in bad order because of decay, by far the greater number of bad-order cars were designated as such because of a shifting of the load. The shift in the load varied all the way from a few inches to a few feet, and was accompanied by damage varying from a few loose covers or slats to an apparent wreck of the entire load. A detailed study was made of shifted loads in an attempt to determine so far as possible the cause of the shift in each car as well as the extent of the damage. It was hoped that a study of the data thus secured would bring out suggestions regarding methods of loading or handling that might be a means of reducing this sort of damage.
